

Two streets named for IU personalities

in it to the grocery store and picked out the eggs that were too large to go through the hole.

ATWATER AVENUE is named for him, because it runs in the vicinity of some land he developed. His eccentricity as a teacher unfortunately made him the butt of student pranks and jokes. A bogus publication referred to him as "Poor old 'Atty,'" and called for his resignation from the faculty. He awoke one morning to find a birch bark canoe with a red lantern headlight on his lawn. No student was willing to own up to the prank or explain its significance.

Jordan, educated at Cornell University, was a scientist/naturalist. After holding teaching positions at Lombard University in Galesburg, Ill., and the Collegiate Institute at Appleton, Wis., he was hired by an Indianapolis high school. During the latter tenure, he received an MD degree from the Indiana Medical College.

A dapper-looking man, Jordan came to IU after a teaching stint at Butler University. It was during his professorship that IU moved from the campus in Seminary Square to Dunn's Woods. He was selected as IU's seventh president in December 1884, after the sudden resignation of Lemuel Moss.

JORDAN WAS an authority on fish, and devoted his summers to making walking tours of Europe. Students were welcome to join him, and many did during his tenure at IU.

Jordan's presidency lasted only six years. In 1891, when he was 40 years old, he accepted the post of president of Leland Stanford Junior University. The Stanfords—man and wife—made a trip to Bloomington to lure Jordan away. Senator and Mrs. Stanford arrived in town in a private Union Pacific train, and left with the university president.

Some time after his departure, it was suggested that a building be named for him. In a letter to Bloomington, Jordan is supposed to have declined the honor, saying that he would just as soon have the stream through the campus given his name. Thus, Spankers Branch became the Jordan River.
