separate properties — Alex Kelly, 75 acres, $430; Belle Kelly, $2,450.

The following year (1926), when he died, she alone was listed as having property in the value of $2,685, which may have then included his property minus the funeral expenses.

Even in death the Kellys were separated — he buried in the family cemetery on his property, and she in the Covenanter one at the corner of Moore's Pike and High Street. In death, they received equal front-page obituaries in the local newspapers.

Of her eccentricities the Indianapolis News revealed, "Until two months ago she had lived in the same house with her husband, but had not spoken a word to him in years. She has a large farm, well-stocked, and money in Bloomington banks. Every Saturday she comes to town in a high-wheeled cart, and brings butter and eggs, which she manages, besides doing other farm work . . . She has never missed a world's fair, and has seen every one in the last 50 years. She usually takes one of her nieces with her when she attends the fair, and is known as a lavish spender on any kind of entertainment she enjoys."
